BIG SHOT

EVER since Elmer first laid eyes on Patty, he was a goner! The mere mention of her name turned his face scarlet—and the sight of her in school, or walking down the street, made him goose-pimply all over. The truth of the matter was that all women frightened him and generally he steered clear of them. But somehow, Patty was different—she attracted him like honey draws bees! Poor Elmer had it bad, and try as he might, there was nothing he could do about it. And Patty, the slickest, most popular chick in school, hardly knew he existed—even though he was one of East Side High's best basketball players! What was more discouraging, she had eyes only for Horace Heartthrob, the handsomest, swooniest boy in the senior class.

The thought of Horace made Elmer burn. "Maybe he does have a way with women," he grumbled to himself, "but that's all he's good for! Why, he couldn't make a basket if his life depended on it!"

So Elmer continued to moon over Patty—from afar. But things changed when old Dr. Fossil, the school principal, announced that the Senior Hop would be held the following week. Elmer's heart began to pound like a tom-tom. Come what might, he was determined to ask Patty, even if he died in the attempt!

Beads of perspiration bespangled his brow as he waited outside the auditorium door for Patty to emerge. Finally—there she was! He started to stammer, his face brick-red, and finally the words came out in a stumbling rush. "Er—Patty! Would you—that is, could you—I—mean w-will you go to the Senior Hop with m-me?"

Patty didn't know the agony Elmer was suffering—nor did she care. With a far-off look and a laugh of amusement, she retorted "Don't be a sill! Everyone knows I'm going with Horace Heartthrob!" It was a cruel blow, and Elmer was speechless with misery as he turned away. But she was so beautiful that he determined he wouldn't give up. True, the Senior Hop was out—but how about the Class Picnic, which was due in another few weeks? It took time to summon up his nerve, but he finally made the plunge in French class one afternoon and slipped her a note of invitation. She scanned it briefly, then, her face cold, passed him a reply. It read:

"Elmer:

The answer is NO! By now you should realize that I devote my time only to people who count! Which means I'm going to the picnic with Horace Heartthrob!

Patty"

Elmer was stunned. Then, slowly, he found himself getting angrier and angrier. What did he care, anyway? All women were alike—selfish, silly and fickle! He was through with them for life! From now on he'd devote his time and effort to things that really mattered—to things he was good at—namely, basketball! He couldn't have picked a better time for his decision, since that very night, East Side High was playing its arch rival, Central Tech!

The gymnasium was crowded to the rafters as game-time approached. The championship depended on the game, and East Side's coach didn't miss the opportunity for a pre-game pep talk.

"Give it all you've got, boys," he ordered. "We've gotta win!" Then he turned to Elmer and clapped him on the shoulder. "Remember, boy—I'm counting on you!" he said.

And then it began—the game on which so much depended. Elmer was set to do his best, but it wasn't long before he discovered that something was wrong. He had thought he was through with women for life—but he couldn't shake Patty's tantalizing face from his thoughts! A fast pass sent the ball into his hands and there he was beneath the unguarded basket. "Shoot!" screamed the feverish crowd. Setting himself, he took careful aim—only to find the vision of the beautiful Patty obscuring his target! Sailing through the air, the ball went wild—and to Elmer's horror, bounced squarely off the head of a girl sitting in the first row!

This woke him up. As he rushed to help the girl to her feet, a loud roar of ridicule burst from the crowd. Jeepers creepers, how he wished he could sink through the floor! Painfully he stammered out confused apologies—but what was this? The girl wasn't angry at all! She smiled up at him softly, and in a sweet, melodious voice she said "Oh, that's all right. You tried—and that's what counts, isn't it?"

Dumbfounded, Elmer stared at the girl and swallowed hard. What a vision! What gorgeous red hair, what violet-blue eyes! How come he had never seen her before? Suddenly, everything was different. Heart singing, he bounded back onto the court. Patty's image no longer plagued him—it had disappeared completely! He began to play like a house afire. He was here, there, everywhere, sinking baskets right and left from every corner of the court! Central Tech had been far ahead, but the picture was changing fast. For a wildman was loose in the game—Elmer! They couldn't stop him as, with unerring accuracy, he dropped one shot after another through the hoop. Now Central was leading by but a single point, 64 to 63. Just two seconds to go, and it was Central's ball, directly under their opponents' basket. It looked bad for East Side—until a miracle happened. That miracle was Elmer, coming out of nowhere in a blinding burst of speed! Right out of the hands of Central's captain he stole the ball. There wasn't time to get it down the court—even then, the referee was raising his pistol to signify the end of the game. There was only one thing to do—it was now or never!

Taking a deep breath, Elmer hurled the ball with all of his strength. Through the air and down the court it whizzed. For an agonizing second, it ringed the rim—then dropped through as the gun sounded, ending the game! East Side had won, 65 to 64! The arena was a bedlam of cheers, and in no time Elmer was surrounded by a flock of frenzied fans. He felt someone tugging his arm. It was Patty! She smiled up at him lovingly. "Elmer, darling!" she breathed. "I must have been blind not to realize before how really fine and strong you are! Why, I'll give up Horace Heartthrob any day for you!"

It was here—the moment he had dreamed of! But strangely enough, things seemed different now. Funny, but Patty didn't seem quite as pretty as he remembered her. No longer did his heart do a triple beat at the sound of her voice. No longer did her dark tresses, her provocative brown eyes, bring a gulp to his throat. The tables had turned! This was the new Elmer, his brain afire with visions of gorgeous red hair and lovely violet-blue eyes—his ears ringing to the echo of a melodious voice saying "You tried—and that's what counts, isn't it?"

Elmer started to grin. Reaching down, he detached Patty's hand from his arm. "Better stick to Horace Heartthrob," he said. "He's more your type! And now excuse me, won't you—there's somebody I've got to see!"
